RESEARCH PROGRAM

My research focuses on understanding morally-relevant traits that initially seem benign but can be deceptively pernicious over time (e.g., narcissism). Some questions that guide my program of research include: Why do such traits exist? How can one identify these traits in people? What do such traits ultimately lead to? I take a multi-method approach to answering such questions. Recent projects include trying to understand the mating behaviors of people with narcissism and trying to link that to the likelihood of spreading sexually transmitted infections like HIV. These projects highlight the social and health implications of such traits, while underscoring the value of social and personality psychology for society. Soon, I will be writing a grant with the aim of obtaining funding for a project about narcissism and HIV.
